1.2 Kalamata

Messinia, a Greek region, is situated in the southernmost place of the European continent. Kalamata, the capital of Messinia, is located on the core of Messiniakos gulf, providing an unusual combination of mountain and sea. Greek Government census of March 2001, determined that the population of Kalamata was 57,620 inhabitants. Population's density is characterized as remarkable, as there are 228 citizens per square kilometer. The city of Kalamata occupies a strategic position affording an international airport, and being a link for high demanded tourism destinations. These destinations include islands (i.e. Crete), archaeological places (i.e. ancient Messini, Castle of Methoni), and landscapes/ physical beauties (i.e. Taygetos mountain, Diros Cave). Consequently, Kalamata consists one of the most popular areas to visit in North Greece, enjoying the effects of various types of tourism (domestic, international, religion and sport tourism).
